improve it.<sup>127</sup> In addition to Engineer Doe, at least one other engineer wrote or modified an aspect of the Wi-Fi data collection code.<sup>128</sup>

37. In 2007, another engineer at Google was assigned to review and “debug” the source code for the Wi-Fi data collection project.<sup>129</sup> Coincidentally, that engineer’s office was in close proximity to Engineer Doe’s office.<sup>130</sup> In both his written declaration and his interview with Bureau staff, the engineer characterized the purpose of his review as ensuring that the code used proper syntax and checking for bugs in the program before it became part of Google’s source-code repository.<sup>131</sup> Whenever the engineer found a problem in the code, he either sent an e-mail to Engineer Doe or discussed the problem in person.<sup>132</sup> Nonetheless, despite his line-by-line review of the code, the reference to privacy considerations in the design document, and his proximity to and communications with Engineer Doe, the engineer claims he did not realize at the time that the Wi-Fi data collection program was designed to capture payload data.<sup>133</sup>

38. Other Google engineers were responsible for deploying and testing the software in Street View cars to ensure that it worked as designed. That process is known within the Company as “pushing” the code, and the engineers who deploy and test the software are called “pushers.”<sup>134</sup> A manager of the Street View project estimated that five engineers took turns pushing the Wi-Fi data collection code into Street View cars.<sup>135</sup> One of them discovered a minor bug that caused the program to shut down, and he worked with Engineer Doe to resolve the problem.<sup>136</sup> Despite their hands-on work pushing the code into Street View cars, however, these engineers claimed they did not realize Google was collecting payload data.<sup>137</sup>

39. As early as 2007 and 2008, therefore, Street View team members had wide access to Engineer Doe’s Wi-Fi data collection design document and code, which revealed his plan to collect payload data. One Google engineer reviewed the code line by line to remove syntax errors and bugs, and another modified the code. Five engineers pushed the code into Street View cars, and another drafted code to extract information from the Wi-Fi data those cars were collecting. Engineer Doe specifically told two engineers working on the project, including a senior manager, about collecting payload data. Nevertheless, managers of the Street View project and other Google employees who worked on Street
