According to a report by consultancy firm McKinsey and co-sponsored by the Y Combinator-backed New Finance, blockchain is shaping up as a key component of a third wave of technological revolution underway. Its partner, Silicon Valley venture capital firm Andreessen Horowitz, claimed the application of the technology in such fields as payments, digital government and energy won't be "in the foreseeable future". But those familiar with blockchain technology said it was clearly one of the most important aspects of the new economy. "I have said that blockchain is the financial system's next Eichmann, because it will do to finance what the H-bomb did to the military-industrial complex," DeAndre Testerman, founder of crypto startup Multicoin Capital and former head of financial technology at investment firm Gartner, told CoinDesk. In an interview, he described the use of such data-tracking technology as having the potential to reduce fraud and complexity in the world of high-street finance, describing such improvements as "potentially devastating". "Anyone who has a mortgage or credit card could get 20% lower interest rates," he added. Yet as blockchain turns heads with the financial industry, the technology already holds the potential to disrupt other sectors. It has already been used to help authenticate health records, for example, although McKinsey's report notes that such use cases have been slow to develop. As such, the company says that blockchain f678ea9f9e
